Backstory: Bia and Moa's parents were both peasant farmers, they were childhood sweethearts who got married and had two daughters in quick succession. Tragically, their mother died during the birth of their second daughter. Esa Elin was shaken by the loss of his wife and subconsciously never forgave Moa for causing her death. Although Bia was sly and made trouble for others often, Moa was more gregarious, giving Esa more than enough opportunities to punish her for perceived offenses while he ignored her sister's quiet exploits. Although he supports both of his daughters as best he can, everyone in town knows he has a soft spot for Bia in particular, as she continues being a bit difficult to this day, although he refuses to see it.

The golden child of the Elin family, Bia could do no wrong growing up, and she carries that confidence with her still. Her favorite pastime is going up the mountain to the secluded forest/cave area, alone or with the troublemaking young men of the town, having them witness her so-called "love spells." As she began to discover, some of the old myths she parrots may not be so fantastic after all.
